This paper has argued that Casement's ways of seeing European imperialism and colonialism were shaped by his encounters with African and Irish nationalism, as well as by his experiences as a journalist and political activist. The paper has also explored the ways in which Casement's views on African and Irish nationalism influenced his understanding of the political and social conditions of the time.

Casement's experiences in Africa and Ireland allowed him to see the parallels between the struggles of those peoples and the fight against imperialism in Europe. His work as a journalist and political activist also provided him with a platform to articulate these ideas and to influence the public debate.

In conclusion, Casement's views on African and Irish nationalism were integral to his understanding of the political and social conditions of the time, and his work as a journalist and political activist allowed him to influence the public debate on these issues. His views on African and Irish nationalism were also important in shaping his views on the role of Ireland in the wider context of the European continent, which he believed was crucial to the fight against imperialism in Europe.
