Abstract

Nearly 15 years after 9/11, it is time to grapple with the way in which imperatives of preemption have made their way into routine security practice and bureaucratic operations. As a growing literature in security studies and political geography has argued, preparing for catastrophe, expecting the worst, and scripting disasters are central elements of contemporary, speculative security culture. One of the most-discussed findings of the 9/11 Commission Report was that US security services had insufficiently deployed their imagination to foresee and preempt the attacks. This article introduces a special issue that offers a range of in-depth empirical studies that analyse how the imperative of 'routinizing the imagination' plays out in practice across different policy domains. It deploys the lens of performativity in order to conceptualize and explain the materialization of preemption and its situated entanglements with pre-existing security bureaucracies. We detail the idealized traits of a 'security of the interstice', which include interoperability, emergence, flexibility and analytical foresight that are meant to bridge the perceived gaps of security spaces and the temporal bridges between present and possible futures. The lofty rhetoric of preparing for the worst and bridging the gaps encounters numerous obstacles, challenges and reversals in practice. As becomes clear through the notion of performativity, such obstacles and challenges do not just 'stand in the way' of implementation, but actively shape the materialization of preemption in different sectors.

Zetoc

Zetoc: The monitoring and search service for global research publications

Welcome to Zetoc. We are one of the world's most comprehensive research databases, giving you access to over 29,000 journals and more than 52 million article citations and conference papers through the British Library's electronic table of contents.

Keeping pace with your peers, staying up to date with new research, and expanding your field of knowledge has never been so simple. We make it easy for you to set-up personalised email Zetoc Alerts or RSS feeds to track the latest articles or journal titles related to your interests. In most cases, you can access abstracts or the full text of articles, depending on your institution's subscription arrangements.

Our service is free for members of Jisc-sponsored UK higher and further education institutions, research councils. Among our subscribers are NHS organisations in England, Scotland and Northern Ireland, and a number of other institutions are also eligible to subscribe.

Questions?

Gathering Research for your Dissertation

In most subject fields at Queen's you will be asked to complete a dissertation. While writing the dissertation can be a challenge in itself, so can gathering the resources needed to answer your stated research question.

Try some of the following tips for collecting research material together:

- Refer back to your module guide: Your module guide is full of useful readings and resources. Generally they are neatly organised under topic headings. Your module convenor will have spent a significant amount of time in selecting relevant material for each topic and will have provided you with both essential and desirable readings. Whereas you wouldn't normally be expected to consider all of this reading in advance of a weekly tutorial, you should become familiar with this content if it is relevant to your dissertation research.
- Identify the key words in the dissertation topic: Deconstruct the dissertation title and highlight each of the key words. This is important as the key words will help to inform your background research and will be used when gathering reading material and other resources. Ask yourself, do you fully understand the question and/or the dissertation topic? Often students struggle to begin their research because they aren't sure of the task at hand. Don't be afraid to approach your module tutor for clarity. In addition, feel free to meet with your peers and discuss your proposed dissertation topic.
- Visit the Library: Depending on your discipline, the library will be your first port of call. The various library facilities (McClay, Medical & HSC, and Biomedical Library) are well

My Personal Recommendations

- Start using Refworks now, and you will not regret it later on
- Use Web Crawlers to support your search process
  - Advanced Operators for Web Search on Google
- Save all literature with the full title: Duplicates get then detected quite easily
- Highlight papers you've read in your PDF reader and/or make digital remarks on them to remember (a) that you've read the paper and (b) what you thought of it
