The complexity of the global food supply chain resulted from globalisation, low-cost transportation and advances in food preservation technologies has made food business operators i.e. retailers or producers vulnerable to food fraud. With more than 7000 food, feed and drink commodities being traded among 200 countries every day, we never know when and where we should expect fraud being committed in the global food supply chain.

Early Warning Systems (EWS) are intelligent systems that systematically collect and fuse high volume, high variety, and high velocity data from various sources and applies advanced analytics to data to derive valuable insights that could help the food industry and authorities to detect and prevent food fraud. In Work Package 8 of FoodIntegrity project, we have developed different components of such system.

This workshop aims to introduce EWS to potential end users from industry or safety authorities and engage them in using the tool first hand to get insights regarding potential food fraud incidents. We also aim to explore and demonstrate the possibility of exploring future food fraud scenarios and identifying fraud type using a Bayesian network. We would also like to receive feedback from participants who are either in the industry or safety authorities regarding how easy it is to use the tools and how we could improve them to meet their needs.
